What is Ideology?

An ideology comprises a collection of principles, beliefs, and values that influence the worldview of an individual or group. It affects their attitudes and opinions and provides information for their political, social, economic, and moral stances. Ideologies function as conceptual structures through which one interprets reality, construes societal concerns, and proposes remedies for a multitude of challenges.

Most of the time, an ideology is based on politics, economics, religion, culture, and societal conventions.

Types of Ideology

Ideologies, whether obvious or hidden in nature, exert a substantial impact on human conduct, decision-making processes, and the delineation of individual or collective identity. Ideologies such as nationalism, religion, feminism, capitalism, and socialism are among the most well-known examples.

Importance of Ideology

The influence of ideology on a nation's governance structure, policy trajectory, and societal values is crucial. It exerts an impact on political systems, economic policies, social and cultural values, and even matters of foreign relations and healthcare. Ideology serves as a compass for a nation's overarching aspirations and is fundamental in determining its identity, promoting unity among citizens, or inciting discord.

In democratic societies, it exerts an impact on public discourse and functions as a forum for policy deliberations and electoral processes. Conversely, within authoritarian regimes, it may function as a mechanism to solidify authority. In its entirety, ideology exerts a profound influence on the governance, identity, and trajectory of a nation.

Ideology of Pakistan

The Pakistani ideology originated from the South Asian Muslim community's innate desire to preserve their distinctiveness within the society. The Muslims held the belief that Hinduism and Islam are not merely two religious systems, but also two social institutions that have given rise to unique cultures. The two are incompatible with one another. An extensive examination of the historical context of this region reveals that the divisions between Hindus and Muslims extend beyond the contestation for political dominance and involve the confrontation of two distinct social structures. They continue to cultivate distinct cultures and traditions despite having coexisted for over a millennium.

Architecture, script, musical preferences, and eating customs are all different.

Ideology of Pakistan and Islam

The ideology of Pakistan is based on Islamic values. The Muslim nation was not founded upon any linguistic, ethnic, territorial, or racial distinctions; rather, its members shared the faith of Islam. They advocated for the establishment of a sovereign state in the regions where they possessed the majority so that they could govern their lives in adherence to the principles outlined in the Holy Quran and the Sunnah.

Islamic moral and ethical values were regarded as crucial in influencing the conduct and behaviour of both the state and its citizens. The objective of Pakistani ideology was to instill these values in both the public and private spheres.

The foundation of the ideology of Pakistan was religious freedom, which ensured that Muslims could adhere to their faith without apprehension of persecution or discrimination. Islamic principles about social justice and equity were influential in shaping the ideology of Pakistan. In addition, the principles of equality for all citizens regardless of caste, sect, religion, or region, cultural and religious tolerance, observance of human rights, the rule of law, and dignity of humans are emphasized by Islam. These principles became part of different constitutions enacted in Pakistan.

Economic and Social Deprivations of Muslims in India

During the British rule, the Muslims encountered hardships stemming from historical circumstances and colonial policies. These included both economic and social deprivations.

The British Empire's interest was imposing their economic policies aimed at strengthening the British colonial administration. These policies frequently resulted in the depletion of India's resources, which impacted numerous communities economically, especially Muslims. The land tenure system transformed with the implementation of the Zamindari system by the British, resulting in the displacement of a significant number of Muslim cultivators.

Muslims were also deprived of access to employment and educational opportunities, which contributed to economic disparities. The educational policies of the British administration discouraged Arabic and Persian and focused on English language. This caused further disadvantages for the Muslims. Their lack of education impeded the Muslims' ability to compete for specialized occupations and gain access to economic opportunities, thereby intensifying economic disparities.

The hostility of Hindu revivalist movements towards Muslims intensified over time. The Hindi-Urdu Controversy 1867, which ensued after the unsuccessful War of Independence 1857, constituted the most significant Hindu challenge to the Muslim legacy and heritage of the extensive Muslim Empire. With Hindus perceiving Urdu as the language of Muslims, prejudice against it arose.

Workplace discrimination was widespread throughout British India. Numerous Muslims faced challenges when attempting to obtain British-controlled or government-led occupations.

In the hiring process, the British frequently favoured Hindus. Consequently, Muslims felt politically excluded. Discriminatory employment practices and under representation in administrative and economic institutions impeded their ability to advance economically. The economic and social deprivation of the Muslims in United India was another important reason that made Muslims think of their own separate state where they could implement their own policies.

■ Quaid-e-Azam (ﷺ) and the Ideology of Pakistan

Quaid-e-Azam Muhammad Ali Jinnah (ﷺ) was instrumental in establishing the ideology of Pakistan. Through his speeches, he effectively communicated the overarching ideology of Pakistan. Quaid consistently and unambiguously regarded the Muslim community as his political community and advocated and promoted its bare necessities throughout his illustrious career. Quaid's political experiences, particularly his participation in conflicts between the British and Hindus while being a member of the Muslim community significantly influenced his viewpoint on Muslim self-determination. His political philosophy shaped each of his orations and written compositions.

Quaid-e-Azam (ﷺ) ardently supported the Two-Nation Theory, which postulated that the Hindu and Muslim populations in British India constituted separate nations characterised by unique religious, cultural, and social identities. To safeguard the interests and liberties of Muslims, this concept formed the basis for the demand for Pakistan, an independent Muslim state. Quaid e Azam Muhammad Ali Jinnah (ﷺ) was convinced that the economic, social, and other interests of the Muslims could not be safeguarded within India. He said:

"The Muslims are a nation by every right to establish their separate homeland. They can adopt any means to promote and protect their economic social, political and cultural interests."

While addressing in Lahore in 1940, he said:

"Islam and Hinduism are not religions in the strict sense of the word, but are, in fact, different and distinct social orders; and it is a dream that the Hindus and Muslims can ever evolve a common nationality, and this misconception of one Indian nation has gone far beyond the limits and is the cause of more of our troubles and will lead India to destruction if we fail to revise our notions in time. The Hindus and Muslims belong to two different religious philosophies, social customs, and literature[s]. They neither intermarry nor interdine together, and indeed they belong to two different civilisations which are based mainly on conflicting ideas and conceptions."

When discussing the ideological difference between the two nations, Quaid-e-Azam (رحمۃ اللہ علیہ) made the following statement on March 2, 1942, during his presidential address at the special session of the Punjab Muslim Students Federation:

"I do not think really that any honest man can possibly dispute the fact that the Muslims are a nation by themselves, distinctly separate from the Hindus.

These speeches make it clear that Quaid-e-Azam (رحمۃ اللہ علیہ) did not doubt that the Muslims of the Subcontinent were a separate nation that could survive only if they were granted a separate homeland where they could practise their beliefs without any fear and pressure.

While Quaid-e-Azam (رحمۃ اللہ علیہ) was clear about the very purpose of the demand of a separate state, he was also convinced that in the new state people belonging to religions other than Islam will have complete liberty to spend their lives as per their own beliefs.

Quaid-e-Azam (رحمۃ اللہ علیہ) placed significant emphasis on the principles of equality and social justice. He aimed to establish a society in which all individuals, irrespective of origin, enjoyed equal rights and opportunities. He vehemently opposed discrimination on the grounds of caste, religion, or creed. On August 11, 1947, Quaid-e-Azam (رحمۃ اللہ علیہ) explained the concept of the new country in these words:

"You are free to go to your places of worship. You may belong to any religion, caste, or creed but it will have nothing to do with the business of the State."

In addition to safeguarding the interest of all the people within Pakistan, Quaid-e-Azam (رحمۃ اللہ علیہ) also advocated for Pakistan to maintain amicable relations with other countries grounded in the principles of mutual respect and equality. His objective was to achieve international recognition for Pakistan as an independent and sovereign nation-state.

Allama Muhammad Iqbal (رحمۃ اللہ علیہ) and the Ideology of Pakistan

Allama Muhammad Iqbal (رحمۃ اللہ علیہ) is the ideological compass and lodestar of Pakistan because he gave the ideological basis for the state of Pakistan. His orations and writings significantly influenced the formation of Pakistan's ideology.

In his Allahabad address, he presented the idea of a separate state for Muslims within South Asia. He said:

"I would like to see the Punjab, North-West Frontier Province, Sind, and Balochistan amalgamated into a single State."

Although the term "Pakistan" was not explicitly mentioned in this address, it is widely regarded as a significant milestone in the evolution of the concept that ultimately culminated in the establishment of Pakistan in 1947. The vision of Allama Muhammad Iqbal (رحمۃ اللہ علیہ) for the establishment of a Muslim-majority state in the northwestern areas of India emerged as a fundamental principle of the Pakistan Movement.

Allama Muhammad Iqbal (رحمۃ اللہ علیہ) placed significant emphasis on the establishment of an Islamic state that would preserve ideals of morality, equity, and justice. He advocated for the implementation of a political structure that is based on the principles and doctrines of Islam. The offspring of this ideology continues to exert an impact on Pakistan's perception of itself as an Islamic country. For Allama Iqbal, keeping Islamic identity was of utmost importance. He advised the Muslims to expect nothing from others and to depend on their own inherent strength. He said:

"Concentrate your whole ego on yourself alone and ripen your clay into real manhood if you wish to see your aspirations realized our ideal is well defined. It is to win the coming constitution a position for Islam which may bring her opportunities to fulfil her destiny in the country. The flame of life cannot be borrowed from others, it must be kindled in the temple of one's own soul."

In 1937, in response to Mr. Gandhi's stance of limiting the Muslims' problem to an economic issue Allama Muhammad Iqbal (رحمۃ اللہ علیہ) wrote a letter to Quaid e Azam. He clearly stated that it was not just an economic problem due to which a separate country was essential but a larger issue of culture too. He wrote:

"It is absolutely necessary to tell the world both inside and outside India that the economic problem is not the only problem in the country. From the Muslim point of view, the cultural problem is of much greater consequence to most Indian Muslims It would further make it clear to the Hindus that no political device, however, subtle, can make the Indian Muslim lose sight of his cultural entity."

Allama Muhammad Iqbal (رحمۃ اللہ علیہ) believed that the Muslim identity is beyond any other identity for the Muslims. He said:

"If Muslims have fallen into the error that religion and nationalism can go hand in hand as a political concept, then I want to give a timely warning to the Muslims that this course will ultimately lead to irreligiousness. And if this does not happen, Islam will be reduced to an ethical ideal with indifference to its social order as an inevitable consequence."

Allama Muhammad Iqbal (رحمۃ اللہ علیہ) emphasized the significance of safeguarding and promoting the Islamic identity of Muslims in the region of South Asia. He encouraged Muslims to focus on their individual self-actualization and personal development. Allama Muhammad Iqbal (رحمۃ اللہ علیہ) advocated for the principles of Muslim self-determination and political sovereignty. The individual expressed a desire for equitable distribution of resources and the establishment of societal equity. The individual presented a case advocating for an economic framework grounded in Islamic principles, with a particular emphasis on economic self-sufficiency, equitable distribution, and the prohibition of interest.

As discussed, the ideology of Pakistan was also based on the social and economic deprivation of the people of India, especially Muslims. In this regard, it is important to learn that British colonial rule was the key factor behind this deprivation. Here we will see what British colonialism was and what its impact was on various aspects of life in the Indo-Pakistan subcontinent.

British Colonialism

British Colonialism refers to the system of governance and control that the British established over various territories and countries around the world, particularly in the 18th and 19th centuries. These countries included Canada, Australia, New Zealand, India, and many others.

In India, British colonialism started in the 17th century with the establishment of the East India Company, which gradually expanded its influence and control over the Indian subcontinent. This period of British rule in India lasted until 1947 when India gained its independence.

During the period of British colonialism in the subcontinent, there were both positive and negative impacts on culture, economy, and political system of the region. Positive impacts included the introduction of modern infrastructure and institutions, as well as the spread of education and the development of a modern legal system.

The negative impacts were far more long-lasting. These included economic, political and social impacts on the subcontinent. In addition to the displacement of indigenous populations and the destruction of their cultural heritage, the British colonial rule also led to the exploitation of local resources and the imposition of unfair economic policies, resulting in widespread poverty and inequality. Additionally, the British implemented divisive policies that fueled religious and communal tensions, leading to long-lasting conflicts in the region.

Exploitation of Resources

The main reason behind the exploitation of resources was the British desire to extract maximum profit from the colonies. They imposed high taxes and tariffs on local industries, forcing them to rely on exporting raw materials rather than developing their own manufacturing capabilities. This not only hindered the economic growth of the region but also perpetuated a cycle of dependency on foreign markets.

During British colonial rule, local industry was discouraged. An example of this phenomenon was the British colonization of the textile industry. Before British rule, India had a thriving textile industry that produced high-quality fabrics and employed a large number of people.

However, the British flooded the Indian market with cheap, machine-made textiles from Britain, making it impossible for Indian weavers to compete. This led to the decline of the Indian textile industry and left many weavers unemployed and impoverished.

Divide and Rule Policy

The divide and rule policy of the British played a significant role in the loss of interreligious harmony among different nations within India. The British supported Hindus over Muslims in almost every field. This resulted in increased tensions and conflicts between the two religious communities, as well as a sense of mistrust and animosity. Additionally, the British colonial rule also had a psychological impact on the Indian population, as it created a sense of inferiority and dependency among the people, leading to a loss of self-confidence and identity.

These and many other policies changed the lives of the people of the Indian subcontinent. The British prioritized cash crops for export over food crops for local consumption. This often led to famines and negatively impacted the agricultural sector, affecting the overall GDP. India was forced to export raw materials to Britain and import finished goods, leading to unfavorable terms of trade. The British implemented revenue policies that burdened Indian farmers with heavy taxes, leading to widespread rural poverty and hindering agricultural productivity.

In these circumstances, different scholars and reformers tried to uplift the status of the Muslims. One such personality is Sir Syed Ahmed Khan who tried to convince Muslims to get modern education to come out of the darkness of illiteracy and poverty.

Sir Syed Ahmad Khan

Sir Syed Ahmed Khan was born in Delhi in 1817. His education encompassed the study of the Quran as well as several scientific disciplines. He possessed a broad range of knowledge and engaged in the study of various subjects, including mathematics, medicine, Persian, Arabic, Urdu, and others.

After the unsuccessful War of Independence 1857, Muslims faced atrocities at the hands of the British as they were blamed to be the main cause of the event. Sir Syed Ahmed Khan penned a significant publication titled 'Asbab-e-Baghawat-e-Hind'

(The Causes of the Indian Revolt) whereby he attributed the uprising primarily to the British ignorance and their assertive policies of expansion.

The influence of Sir Syed's interactions with Western societies significantly shaped his perspectives on progress and education. He possessed an understanding of the significance of Western-style education and recognized its importance for Muslims in acquiring new knowledge to remain abreast of contemporary developments.

Aligarh Movement

The Aligarh Movement, led by Sir Syed Ahmed Khan in the 19th century, constituted a significant socio-educational endeavour with the objective of elevating the Muslim population of the British India. The primary objective of the movement was to tackle the educational underdevelopment among the Muslims by advocating for the adoption of contemporary education, scientific expertise, and practical comprehension of the global environment.

In 1875, Sir Syed established the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental (MAO) College in Aligarh with the aim of establishing an educational institution that would facilitate the integration of Western educational principles with Islamic studies. MAO College subsequently underwent a transformation and emerged as Aligarh Muslim University (AMU). The movement placed significant emphasis on the significance of education in fostering societal advancement and pushed for the integration of scientific and technical education within the educational framework.

The contributions of Sir Syed in advocating for a logical and contemporary perspective on education played a crucial role in equipping Muslims with the necessary abilities to adapt to societal transformations. The Aligarh Movement exerted significant influence on the intellectual milieu of the Muslim populace in India and established the groundwork for enduring educational and social transformations that persist in contemporary times.

■ Role of the Aligarh Movement in the Success of the Pakistan Movement

The Aligarh Movement played a pivotal role in establishing the intellectual and educational foundation that significantly contributed to the advancement of the Pakistan Movement. Multiple facets of the Aligarh campaign held considerable importance in influencing the subsequent course of the campaign for the establishment of Pakistan.

Aligarh Muslim University emerged as a central hub for contemporary education, with its alumni assuming significant positions across diverse domains. The prioritization of education enabled the Muslim youth to acquire the necessary information and competencies to engage meaningfully within social, political, and economic domains.

The Aligarh Movement espoused the cause of safeguarding Muslim liberties within the governmental structure of British India. It encompassed the demand for the establishment of separate electorates, equitable representation of Muslims in governmental positions, and the implementation of political measures to safeguard Muslim participation in legislative bodies.

The movement attempted to cultivate a unique cultural and religious identity for individuals adhering to the Islamic faith, concurrently cultivating a collective sentiment of cohesion among them. The concept of Muslims being perceived as a distinct political and cultural entity gained traction, so establishing the groundwork for the subsequent formulation of the Two-Nation Theory.
